5. Health Issues I mentioned two important health issues on my earlier points. Children often have televisions in their own bedrooms, and as they get older there are fewer and fewer rules about what they can and cannot watch. Television is traditionally thought of as the anti-education tool: after all, children mindlessly absorb television content and spend less time reading, doing homework, or interacting with others. Although there are many, many reasons why television is detrimental to a child's well-being, there actually may be a few redeeming factors as well. As educators, we generally want to be aware of these detriments, but also remain aware of the potential upsides of this enchanting medium as well.
