So when we look at religion and, to some extent ancestral superstitions, we should consider what purpose they serve, rather than focusing on the notion of "belief", epistemic belief in its strict scientific definition. In science, belief is literal belief; it is right or wrong, never metaphorical. The rationality of an action can only be judged by evolutionary considerations. The axiom of revelation of preferences states the following: you will not have an idea about what people really think, what predicts people's actions, merely by asking them "they themselves don't know". It was replaced with something a bit different. "Rationality" was forged in a post-enlightenment period[2], at the time when we thought that understanding the world was at the next corner.
