DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (If known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Blandfield is the largest of a group of mid-Georgian plantation mansions along the lower Rappahannock River. Built of brick finely laid in Flemish bond, Blandfield consists of a two-story central block with flanking two-story dependencies connected to the center section by straight one-story hyphens. The dependencies are placed at right angles to the central block forming a forecourt on the land front. The central block features a three-bay pedimented central pavilion on both the land and river fronts. It is thought that the pavilions were at one time fronted by two-story porches but the present one-story porches are of Greek Revival design. The building is surrounded by a modillion cornice and is topped by a hip-on-hip roof with four interior chimneys. The gauged brick jack arches over all the windows are said to have the widest splay of any in Virginia.

None of the interior decoration survives at Blandfield; the present severely plain woodwork was installed in 1844 after the original was removed. The center hall of the house may have been originally divided into two rooms as it presently is with stair halls on either side of the center hall separating the first floor rooms. These stairs ascend to a large cross hall on the second floor. The original kitchen in one of the dependencies is largely intact.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE (Include Personages, Dates, Events, Etc.)

The exact date of the construction of Blandfield is unknown, but it was probably built circa 1750 for William Beverley (1696-1756), son of Virginia's first native-born historian, Robert Beverley (circa 1673-1722). The estate was named after William Beverley's wife, Elizabeth Bland. Blandfield was sacked by Federal troops during the Civil War, but the house was not damaged.

Architecturally, Blandfield belongs to an important group of mid-Georgian Tidewater mansions which echo the monumental style of Palladio as interpreted in English architectural design books. This group includes Mount Airy, Menokin, Elmwood, and the Carlyle House in Alexandria. Blandfield lost all of its interior woodwork as a result of an 1844 remodeling; it was again altered in 1848 by Van Ness, the contractor who restored the interior of Mount Airy after its fire in 1844.

The plan of Blandfield, with its twin stair halls and spaciouly proportioned rooms, is most ample and unusual. The house remains one of the largest colonial plantation mansions in Virginia and is still owned by the Beverley family.
