The stand-up comic Hari Kondabolu, who is Indian American, had just finished telling a joke about being brown in America when the laughter was interrupted. Thank you, come again! a heckler yelled mockingly in a thick, faux Indian accent. American history offers plenty of examples of enterprising immigrants who have clustered in particular lines of work, from the Chinese laundries of the 1920s to Korean-owned grocery stores and Latino workers in construction and landscaping jobs today. But the experience of the Vietnamese in the nail industry is unique, starting with the sheer geographic scope of their industry dominance. There are Vietnamese-owned and -operated nail salons in every state—even Alaska, says Tam Nguyen. Indians own roughly 40 percent of all motels in the U.S. But their dominance of the industry doesn’t extend beyond America as it does with the Vietnamese. (Vietnamese nail salons can now increasingly be found in cities and towns all over Canada, England, and Australia.) Indian immigrants were typically at the top of the social ladder in the communities that they left behind, but find themselves on the lowest rung in the United States. This is a very uncomfortable experience and provides incredible motivation to do whatever it takes to succeed, as I can tell you from personal experience. I too am an Indian immigrant, and I remember when I first came to the United States as a child in the 60s. My classmates asked me whether I charmed snakes; parents pointed to me and told their children to think about starving Indians before wasting the food on their plates. T
