Now I believe it is the most important thing I ever learned: Life unfolds only in moments. Nobody has ever experienced anything that wasn't a moment in action. I could appreciate and observe each one, and know that my whole life lies within it, not just a tiny fraction. There are no ghastly fears out there, stalking me from somewhere else, waiting to pounce. If they existed, they'd be right here, in the picture for me to look at with the rest of the scenery. Just when I thought there could not possibly be another good investment book out there, along came `The Most Important Thing (I can somewhat qualify as a judge if one scans previous reviews). Irrespective of my judgement, other comments that possibly this book should be avoided, one should stop and reflect a second that an investor should never stop learning. While what "the most important thing every teacher should know" is entirely relative and subjective and seems sensationalizing to even discuss, imagine not understanding that you have to walk before you can crawl. Imagine insisting that students grapple with complexity. They spend the bulk of the learning you've planned trying to decode the assignment, extrapolating from your tone and body language what's most important for them to do to get your approval and a good grade while their brain ends up processing processing processing, going back and forth between short-term right now and long-term this is what I know.
