Help with reading books -- Report a bad link -- Suggest a new listing. Home -- Search -- New Listings -- Authors -- Titles -- Subjects -- Serials. General Robert E. Lee had succeeded at the Battle of Chancellorsville and decided to push north in his Gettysburg campaign. He met the Union forces in Gettysburg, Pennsylvania. Lee concentrated his army's full strength against Major General George G. Meade's Army of the Potomac at the Gettysburg crossroads. On July 1, Lee's forces moved on the Union forces in the town from both the west and the north. The Pickett-Pettigrew assault (more popularly, Pickett's Charge) briefly struck through the Union line but was quickly repulsed with severe casualties. At the same time, Stuart's cavalry tried to gain the Union rear, but his forces were also repulsed. On July 4, Lee began withdrawing his army toward Williamsport on the Potomac River. An historical essay / by Capt. W.R. Bond. 2nd ed., rev. and enl. A comparison of the conduct in the charge at Gettysburg of the troops commanded respectively by Generals Pickett and Pettigrew.
