In "The Laugh of the Medusa", Helene Cixous asserts the necessity of women writing themselves. The use of the word "women" is a metaphor of women existing as collective female bodies. The writer is concerned about women's lack of ability to write literature. Women and their use of language are more liquefied, more unstable, and more flowing than men. It is essential for the reader to understand that while Cixous writes about women and woman, at times, she means to portray the physical qualities of women which are vaginas and breasts. Even though Lawrence uses different techniques to describe his theme on freedom, his opinion and his personal message to the reader appears to be the same. This message is that we should be thankful that we are free and able to do whatever we want and what is best for us, without someone having to make our minds up for us.
