Research about health visiting actions focuses on home visiting, needs assessment and parent-health visitor relationships. The detailed description of health visitors' skills, attitudes, values, and their application in practice, provides an explanation of how universal provision can potentially help to promote health and shift the social gradient of health inequalities. Conclusions Identification of needs across an undifferentiated, universal caseload, combined with an outreach style that enhances uptake of needed services and appropriate health or parenting information, creates opportunities Describe the advantages and benefits of using descriptive research methods. Describe the disadvantages and limitations of using descriptive research methods. Descriptive research may be a precursor to future research because it can be helpful in identifying variables that can be tested. A researcher may be looking at the health outcomes for the children of low income families living in a particular neighborhood. The finding may point the researcher to specific variables that may be impacting health that warrant further study. Essentials of behavioral research: Methods and data analysis. Background: Home visiting by public health nurses and family visitors is promoted as an important intervention for enhancing parent and child development. Mothers of children at-risk for developmental delays tend to be the most difficult to access and engage, and commonly drop out of home visiting programmes prematurely. Purpose: This paper reports a study developing a theory that describes the process by which mothers of children at-risk engage with public health nurses and family visitors in a blended home visiting programme. Methods: Grounded theory was used to guide the collection, recording
