Women have to deal with making less than men in wages and a difficult time advancing to the highest positions within a company. Women are also subjected to the "Mommy Wars" -- a set of battles between working moms and stay-at-home moms in which each side declares that the other side is irreparably harming their children. And while the recession may have forced more men to stay home, they didn't necessarily pick up the bulk of the housework or childcare.Â Though change is still in the air, there's no doubt that men and women's roles have become less strictly defined, and many families have made the male and female roles more egalitarian when it comes to jobs, housework and childcare. Women are half the worldâ€™s potential and unleashing it requires access to decent, good-quality paid work as well as gender-sensitive policies and regulations, such as adequate parental leave and flexible hours. The economics make sense, too: If women played an identical role in labour markets to that of men, as much as US$28 trillion, or 26 per cent, could be added to the global annual Gross Domestic Product by 2025.Â Unemployment. Women are more likely to be unemployed than men worldwide, with wide disparities regionally. In 2015, around 197 million people of working age were unemployed â€“ 27 million higher than the pre-financial crisis level of 2007. Youth unemployment is
