Make classroom learning fun with engaging games that focus students on learning content while working together. Do you love using games in your classroom to engage students with their learning? I often use a game during a culminating activity after we have had a bit of content under our belts. It's a new, innovative way for students to work with the content at a different level. They love it! Below is a guest post from Corinne at Alternate Tutelage. Here she gives you five games to play in your own classroom. Most of the games are a twist on well-known games, so students shouldn't have too much trouble learning the rules. Enjoy! What makes a good teacher? Here are eight great games, activities and tech tools to help your students learn to collaborate in the classroom. Build your student community! The days of students silently working independently from textbooks at desks neatly arranged into perfect rows are long gone! In today's classroom, you're more likely to see students standing or sitting together around tables or huddling on the rug, gesturing and talking excitedly, drawing diagrams on tablets, sketching ideas on whiteboards, or gathered around computers. Collaborative learning is a 21st-century skill that is at the top of most districts' curricula. Tools like Learning Communities and Discussions have made Edmodo one of the most popular free education tools on the Web. 5. Zoom in on the details!
