In some of this planet’s driest regions, where rainfall is rare or even nonexistent, a few specialized plants and insects have devised ingenious strategies to provide themselves with the water necessary for life: They pull it right out of the air, from fog that drifts in from warm oceans nearby. Â The team is currently carrying out a yearlong test to study the durability and water yield of different configurations. María Tou â€™14, an MIT undergraduate, worked with the team in Chile, helping to install instrumentation that can observe the fluid mechanics associated with the fog droplets as they collect, grow and coalesce on the meshes. Â Wonderful concept! I wonder if orienting the mesh on the diagonal would improve the drainage of the precipitated water and thereby improve the collection?
