All the attention got McHargue interested in the idea of deconstruction³ "how beliefs can shift over time. "Sociologists tell us that⁴ and it varies a percent or two year by year⁵ but 43 to 44 percent of people will go through a major faith transition at some point in their life," he says. "And that⁶ any faith transition. "People are very afraid of what looks like deconstruction," says Father Richard Rohr, friar and founder of the Center for Action and Contemplation. "You go back to the first 1,300 years of Christianity, and faith is defined as a combination of knowing and not knowing. Of a willingness and readiness by the grace of God to live with a certain degree of unknowing or what the mystics call darkness," Rohr says.
