“What is the connection between shamanism, wounded healers and the ‘true Jungians’?” is the question Merchant has set himself is, and his answer is well worth engaging with. He locates the role of the shaman within the tradition of Jungian archetypal psychology, and gives what he calls a “Case study” from the “Siberian Sakha (Yakut) tribe” (pp. 99ff.), in order to argue for the link between the two approaches, that Jung himself and some first and second generation. The shaman is a wounded healer; having suffered through his own dark times and fought his own inner demons. He is a seer and a communicator; he has the ability to consort with spirits and animal guides to assist in the endeavours to release others from their pain. More so, he is a healer of the soul, not the body; a common misconception. Many Native American tribes believe that if a person falls ill; whether in mind, spirit or body, that an evil spirit has entered him. They believe that if bad luck befalls the entire tribe or land, that it is the spirits that control this. They depend on the s...
