Portrait of a self-portrait. Roughly 250 years later, the Dutch artist Vincent van Gogh developed a different concept of self-portraits than his compatriot Rembrandt. The artist who did not manage to sell a single painting during his lifetime was not working on branding his own image. Van Gogh was still living with his parents in Nuenen when, one day on his way to school, he bumped into the grave of his brother.Â Even if the self-portraits of Rembrandt, Picasso and Beckmann have involved much more work, the selfies overflowing social networks do share some similarities with those of art history: The only thing that can be seen is the torso. The background remains shadowy. However, there is also a major difference: The significant self-portraits of art history hold time.
